Young people crave for discoveries; however, they lack communication and social skills. They are not aware of their vulnerability. They face, in their environment, a crisis of morality, economics and family, and bad models of identification as well. The media, with their role of model and universal dealers are often promoters of pseudo-science. Children should achieve their need for love within a family. But this is often not the case. Hence they fall into the hands of those who have mastered the skills of seduction. It is necessary to strengthen the social skills of young people, to network with everyone who is dealing with this problem and put the issue in the legislative framework.
